One of Indonesia's current development sectors is climate change control. The creation of the Climate Village Program (ProKlim), so that communities at the site level can carry out adaptation, mitigation, and institutional actions & sustainable support. Palasari Hamlet is a ProKlim hamlet, but has low participation from the female population, so that achieving program sustainability is slightly hampered. The purpose of this study was to determine women's participation in the Climate Village Program. The method used in this research is a case study with data collection through interviews, observation, and documentation. The results showed that women's participation went through 4 stages, (1) women's participation in ProKlim planning, including response participation such as asking questions in socialization activities in the Sustainable Food House program. (2) Women's participation in the implementation of ProKlim, there is participation of expertise and labor, for example in agroforestry activities. (3) Women's participation in the utilization of ProKlim results, there is an increase in knowledge because it is reflected in the skills in utilizing yard land to improve food security. (4) Women's participation in the evaluation of ProKlim, namely by giving opinions/responses when the activity/program has been implemented in the form of answering questions from the head of the hamlet/head of the Annadopah Group. ProKlim is a series of processes using the principle of empowerment, with the aim of reducing greenhouse gas emissions to create equitable welfare. The conclusion is that the Climate Village Program implemented in Palasari Hamlet has women's involvement in planning, implementation, utilization of results and evaluation.
